C1 Essay

Your class has had a discussion about how important competitions in general are for young people. You have made the notes below:

Benefits of competition for young people

- teaches them to strive for excellence/do their best
- reflects the real world
- builds team spirit

Some opinions expressed in the discussion:

"It allows young people to show what they can do and everyone enjoys success."

"I think competitions teach critical thinking, decision-making and problem solving."

"Competitions get people to collaborate, which is essential in today's world."

Write an essay for your teacher discussing two of the benefits in your notes. You should explain which factor you think is the most beneficial about competitions, providing reasons to support your opinion.

You may make use of the opinions expressed in the discussion, but you should use your own words as far as possible.

Write your answer in 220 - 260 words.

In contemporary society, competitions are often debated regarding their overall importance for young people. This essay will discuss how competitive environments can successfully build team spirit and encourage young people to do their best.

To begin with, competitions have many benefits for young people. Firstly, they can improve their teamwork skills. Moreover, building team spirit is important because it creates a better working environment where everyone feels more united. By working together towards a common goal, individuals learn to support each other and cooperate. This is particularly useful because being able to work as part of a team is essential in today's interconnected world.

Furthermore, competitions can encourage young people to give their best, as they provide an important source of motivation. This internal drive helps them overcome difficult challenges and improve their abilities. They also have the opportunity to demonstrate their skills and feel proud of their achievements. In my opinion, this is the most beneficial factor because learning to work hard and improve themselves can help young people achieve their goals not only in sports but also in their future adult lives.

In conclusion, competitions are important for young people because they encourage teamwork and personal improvement. By developing these qualities, competitive activities can prepare them to face the modern world with greater confidence and motivation.
